THE DODGERS AND LOS ANGELES: 30 YEARS OF EXCITING BASEBALL

It was on April 18, 1958 that the Dodgers paraded through downtown on the way to their new West Coast home in the Memorial Coliseum.

The Coliseum was a temporary home, though, while the Dodgers awaited the completion of Walter O'Malley's dream stadium.

But the short occupancy was certainly not short on memories — Roy Campanella's special night, Wally Moon's Moon Shots, and a World Championship, to name a few.

In 1962, the Dodgers moved a few miles north to Dodger Stadium, a place regarded by many as the best and most beautiful in baseball.

The Dodgers found great success in their new home, winning three World Championships, seven National League Pennants and six Western Division titles.

Attendance records were set when the Dodgers drew over three million fans in 1978 for the first time in Major League history and drew a record total of 3,608,881 fans in 1982.

This year marks the Dodgers' 30th Anniversary in Los Angeles, and along with the celebration comes memories of some of baseball's finest moments in L.A.

No two people are the same. Everybody expects something different from their car or truck.

That's why Nissan offers lots of different models. With hundreds of different color and body-style combinations. And thousands of equipment options.

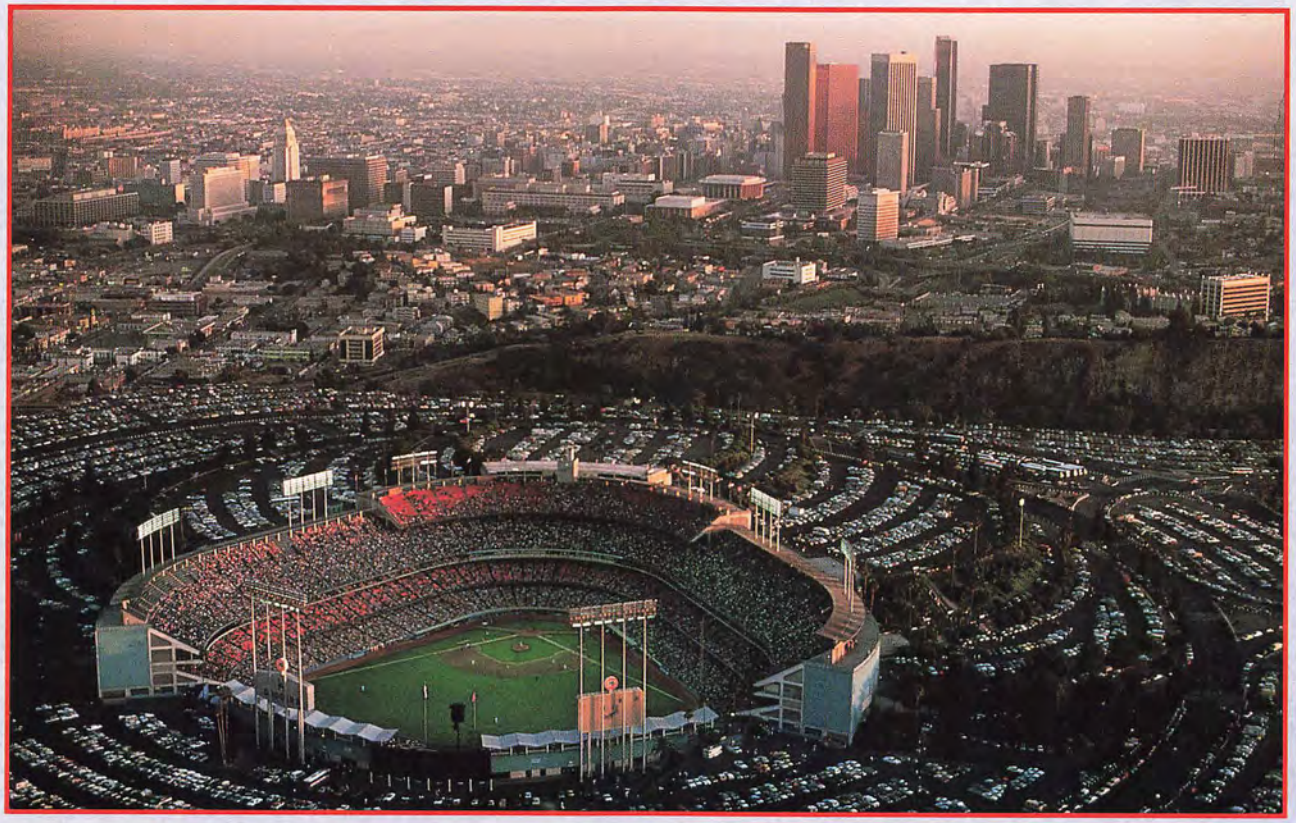
DODGERS: A TEAM EFFORT FOR SUCCESS



by Terry Johnson
Daily Breeze

Dodger Stadium sits atop a part of Los Angeles known as Chavez Ravine, overlooking one of the world's great urban centers — a sprawling metropolis of more than eight million people.

Below the stadium, skyscrapers rise in ever-growing numbers, stretching fingers of concrete and girder steel towards the heavens. It's a city constantly on the move — upwards.

Amid the rumble of rush-hour traffic comes the ever-present pounding of the jackhammers and roar of earth-moving machines. New constructions sprout like mushrooms on an ever-developing landscape.

Stories have already run in local newspapers depicting what the city will look like by the year 2000.

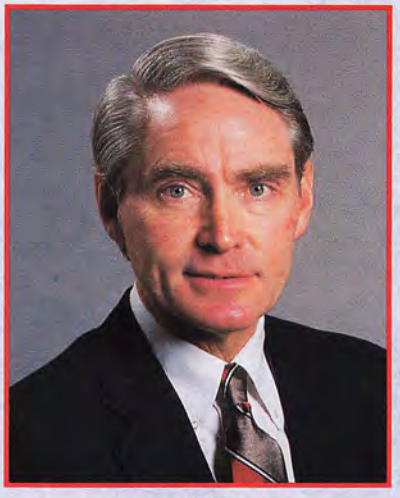
Los Angeles definitely has its own blueprint for success.

So do the Los Angeles Dodgers.

The Dodgers, though, are girding for success in the present as well as the future with a raft of offseason changes that has changed the complexion of the ballclub and strengthened it in many areas.

When the 1988 season opened, the 24-man roster contained no less than 13 players who weren't there on opening day, 1987.

The biggest changes came after the 1987 season ended, particularly when the Dodgers made a blockbuster trade with the Oakland A's and New York



Fred Claire

Mets. That brought them a trio of All-Stars in shortstop Alfredo Griffin, and relievers Jesse Orosco and Jay Howell.

Soon after, the Dodgers re-signed veteran right-hander Don Sutton as a free agent. Then they added needed muscle to the batting order by signing slugging outfielders Kirk Gibson and Mike Davis.

During spring training, the Dodgers put the finishing touches on the club, most notably by adding catcher Rick Dempsey, who was invited to camp as a non-roster player.

The result was on opening day the Dodgers were able to field a club that was stronger in each of the three basic areas of the game: offense, defense and pitching.

The Dodgers' "Blueprint For Success" in 1988, well-planned and well-drafted, has been put into place.

Yet, while the Dodgers' on-field personnel are the most visible, they represent only a small part of a large organization that has been enjoying success after success for years.

Behind the players stands a support group that numbers in the hundreds, although it's a support group that's largely invisible.

Most dyed-in-the-wool baseball fans don't need to look at the program or the media guide to find out what they want to know about their favorite Dodger. They know their players like their own addresses or Social Security numbers.

Common knowledge is the fact that Orel Hershiser played junior hockey growing up in the Philadelphia area, then pitched for Bowling Green University before the Dodgers drafted him in 1979.

Ken Howell still wears a favorite T-shirt from Tuskegee Institute, where he pitched before the Dodgers made him their No. 3 pick in the June draft in 1982, but most Dodger fans already know that.

It's a neophyte fan, indeed, who does not already know that slugger Pedro Guerrero grew up in the Dominican Republic and broke in with the Cleveland Indians before the Dodgers obtained him in a 1974 trade, or that Fernando Valenzuela was an unknown left-hander out of Echohuaquila, Mexico, before he took baseball by storm in 1981.

The fact that Dave Anderson was a star at Memphis State University and that Steve Sax likes to play the drums in his spare time are all widely known.

Many fans also know that Dodger President Peter O'Malley is a graduate of the Diamond Vision Booth

Wharton School of Business and Finance, and got his start in the organization as the director of the club's spring training complex in Vero Beach. Fred Claire, it's widely known, is a former sportswriter who covered the Dodgers before rising to the position of Executive Vice President.

The real discerning fan may even know that Charlie Blaney, the Dodgers' new Director of Minor League Operations, was named minor league executive of the year when he served as general manager of the Dodgers' Albuquerque farm club or that Director of Scouting Ben Wade also pitched in the Dodger organization for six years.

Those who follow the NBA know that Tommy Hawkins was a basketball star at Notre Dame and with the Lakers long before he became the Dodgers' new Vice President of Communications.

But if you think that means you really know the Dodgers, guess again.

Did you know, for example, that Dodger clubhouse manager Nobe Kawano got his start in baseball way back in the mid-1930's working with his brother, Yosh, for the Chicago White Sox when they trained in Pasadena?

Are you aware that Irene Tanji was a member of the Dodger family for 30 years and is now the Director of Human Resources, or that Paul Kalil — a USC graduate — has done such an impressive job working with the Dodgers' Diamond Vision operation that the NFL has "borrowed" him the last few years to work the Super Bowl?

Okay, so you know that Don Newcombe, the Dodgers' Director of Community Relations, won both the National League MVP and Cy Young Awards in 1956. And you know that Roy Campanella, a member of the Community Services Team, is a Hall of Fame catcher and that minor league pitching instructor Sandy Koufax pitched four no-hitters and was named MVP of the World Series twice.

But did you also know that Pat Screnar attended the University of Montana before he became the Dodgers' team therapist or that Tommy Yamamoto has worked for the Dodgers more than 25 years in stadium operations and the ticket department, or that Lori Risk has worked the Blue Level since 1974, starting as an usher and rising to the rank of captain?

The point is this: the 24 players, Manager Tommy Lasorda and his coaching staff are the most visible, but they're only a small part of the Dodger organization — the tip of the iceberg, so to speak.

It takes an awful lot more than just the men who go out on the field every day to make a winning organization. For each player, there are probably 10 others working behind the scenes who make it possible for him to play ball as a Dodger, from the scouts to the instructors in the minor leagues, from the grounds crew to the president of the ballclub himself.

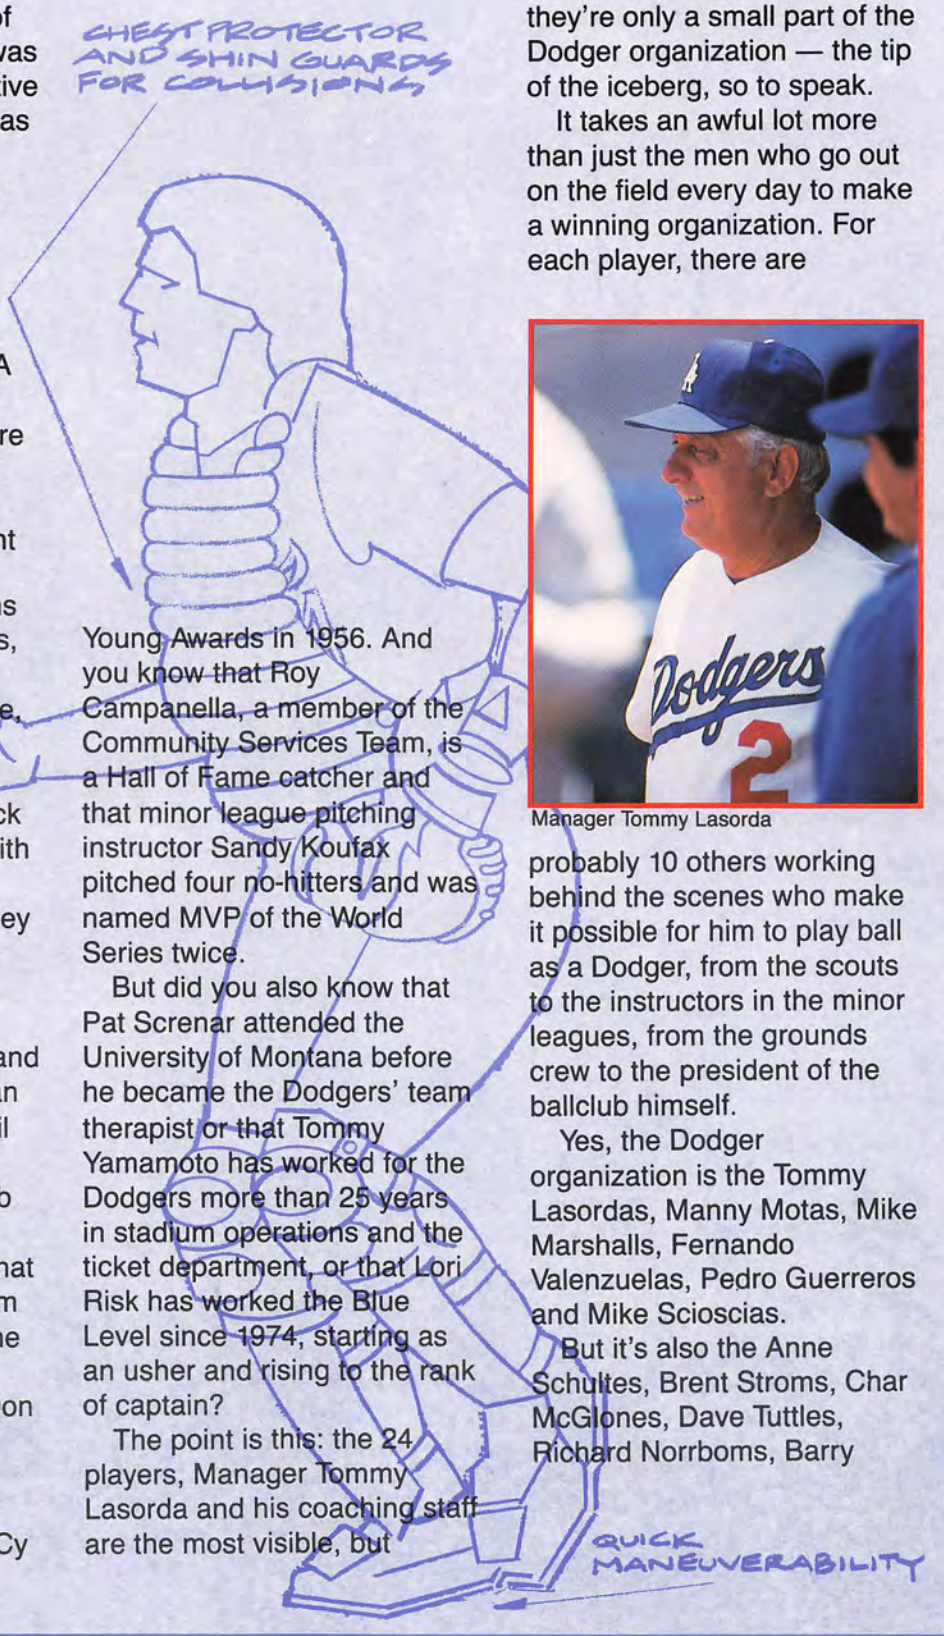
Yes, the Dodger organization is the Tommy Lasordas, Manny Motas, Mike Marshalls, Fernando Valenzuelas, Pedro Guerreros and Mike Scioscias.

But it's also the Anne Schultes, Brent Stroms, Char McGlones, Dave Tuttles, Richard Norrboms, Barry



Stockhamers, Walter Nashes, Pat McKernans, Robert Schweppes, Leo Posadas and Laurel Hewitts.

Including seven farm clubs and a baseball academy in the Dominican Republic, the Dodgers have more than 970 employees. Only about 200 of them are uniformed ballplayers. The front-office staff at Dodger Stadium alone numbers 225.

Most of those names will never appear on a lineup card, but all are important to the success of the Dodgers. From the grounds crew to the speakers bureau, all have the same goal: to make the Dodgers the winningest, most productive, best-run organization in baseball.

"You look at the players on the field and it's just the tip of the iceberg," said Claire, who has been with the Dodgers since 1969.

"The depth of the baseball part of our operation is shown at our organizational meetings, where we have all of the Dodger scouts and player development people, plus all of the major league people. It gives you an idea of what's behind the players on the field. It's even broader than that. There are many parts of the business that must come together for us to be successful.

"The front office staff is involved in the business operations, tickets, marketing and stadium operations among other areas. It really is a complete business and it's not understood by a lot of people. We've been asked many times, 'What do you do in the offseason?' The operation never stops. It's literally working every day; a tremendous number of man hours."

Although the Dodger organization is made up of many components, it's often said the farm system is the lifeblood of the Dodger organization.

It's this facet of the organization that Blaney heads, along with Guy Wellman, a former Dodger scouting supervisor, who's now in charge of field instruction in the minor leagues.

The initial work is done by Wade and the staff of scouts who literally cover the globe looking for top talent, whether it's Dominican right-hander Alejandro Pena, or outfielder Mike Marshall from Libertyville, Ill.

Then Blaney and a staff of more than 50 instructors, managers, coaches, trainers and team executives spend years developing the talent uncovered by the staff of some 35 major league scouts, plus countless "bird dog" scouts who comb the high schools and colleges in search of ballplayers.

It takes an average of three to five years for a player to work his way up through the Dodger farm system, assuming he has the talent to make it to the major leagues in the first place.

Instructor Tommy Davis with Dave Anderson

Sifting through the young talent and then developing it is an enormous task, one that's grown each year. In addition to their triple-A farm club in Albuquerque, double-A club in San Antonio and single-A club at Vero Beach, the Dodgers also have single-A farm clubs in Bakersfield, and Rookie League Clubs in Sarasota and Great Falls. In the last year, they've added a short season A club in Salem, Ore., and the Campo Las Palmas in the Dominican Republic.

"The whole thing starts off with our scouting department," Blaney said. "We are the research and development aspect. Scouting finds the talent, then turns them over to us.

"If the player has the talent necessary to make it to the major leagues, he moves up the ladder a rung at a time. A player doesn't always have to go up every step, but it's an orderly progression.

"It's our job to take that raw talent and fine tune it. It's our job not only to develop their baseball skills, but to develop them as Dodger professional players. We work to see them behave and act as professionals. If a player makes an error and is booed playing in Vero Beach and can't handle it, he's not going to be able to handle it if it happens at Dodger Stadium. Our job is to assist them in any way necessary. By the time a young man gets to the major leagues, we want him to be a finished and complete ballplayer.

"We operate under the same principle as any business as far as finding a raw product and developing it, and making it available to the public."

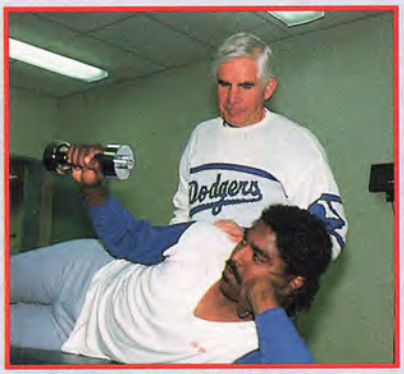
That job, however, becomes more complex all the time. Before he returned to the major league operation, Blaney spent more than a decade as the director of Dodgertown in Vero Beach. He found there's a lot more to developing talent than there used to be.

"I think the job has become increasingly more complicated over the years," he said, "certainly with all the different aspects of baseball . . . insurance, agents, drugs and alcohol abuse. We put together a complete package to help educate the players on such subjects as drugs, alcohol, AIDS, psychological help and counseling and nutrition. It's not just a case of signing a player and playing ball. It's a total package.

"Our whole society has gotten a lot more complex. There's a lot more involved these days. That's true in baseball as well."

Once a player makes it to the major leagues, he receives help from a whole different support group.

That support begins with Lasorda, who's back for his 12th season as the Dodger manager, plus pitching coach Ron Perranoski, infield coach Bill Russell, outfield coach Joe Amalfitano, bullpen coach



Head Trainer Bill Buhler with Ken Howell

Mark Cresse, Manny Mota and Ben Hines as hitting instructors, and Joe Ferguson as the "Eye-in-the-Sky."

Then there's the Dodger medical staff, headed by team physicians Dr. Frank Jobe and Dr. Michael Mellman. They oversee a staff that treats the ballplayers in a variety of ways, from a case of the flu to elbow surgery.

Veteran trainer Bill Buhler heads a three-man staff that's involved in the day-to-day treatment of injuries, along with assistant trainer Charlie Strasser and Screnar as therapist. However, their efforts go far beyond icing a pitcher's elbow or wrapping an ankle. The Dodger training program includes exercise, injury prevention, rehabilitation and the latest in diagnostic and therapeutic equipment.

Dodger Clubhouse

Those ballplayers, managers and coaches don't go anywhere without the efforts of Bob Schenz, Director of Administration and Transportation, and traveling secretary Billy DeLury. Together, they move the Dodgers around the 11 other cities in the National League — an estimated 70,000 miles a year — taking care of everything from air travel to hotel accommodations and ground transportation.

Inside the clubhouse, Kawano and assistant Dave Wright handle hundreds of pounds of equipment. Kawano, Wright and their staff take care of everything from ordering new bats to sewing players' names on the back of the uniforms. When the Dodgers go on the road, Kawano and Wright move more than a ton of uniforms, playing gear, luggage, medical and broadcasting equipment.

Before the Dodgers hit the field, it's the job of the grounds crew to make sure everything's in shape. It's not easy to keep the grass at Dodger Stadium green and the infield smooth through a long season, but their job lasts the year round. In the offseason, the grounds crew renovates the field, plants new sod and prepares it for the upcoming season.

Then there's Dodger Stadium itself.

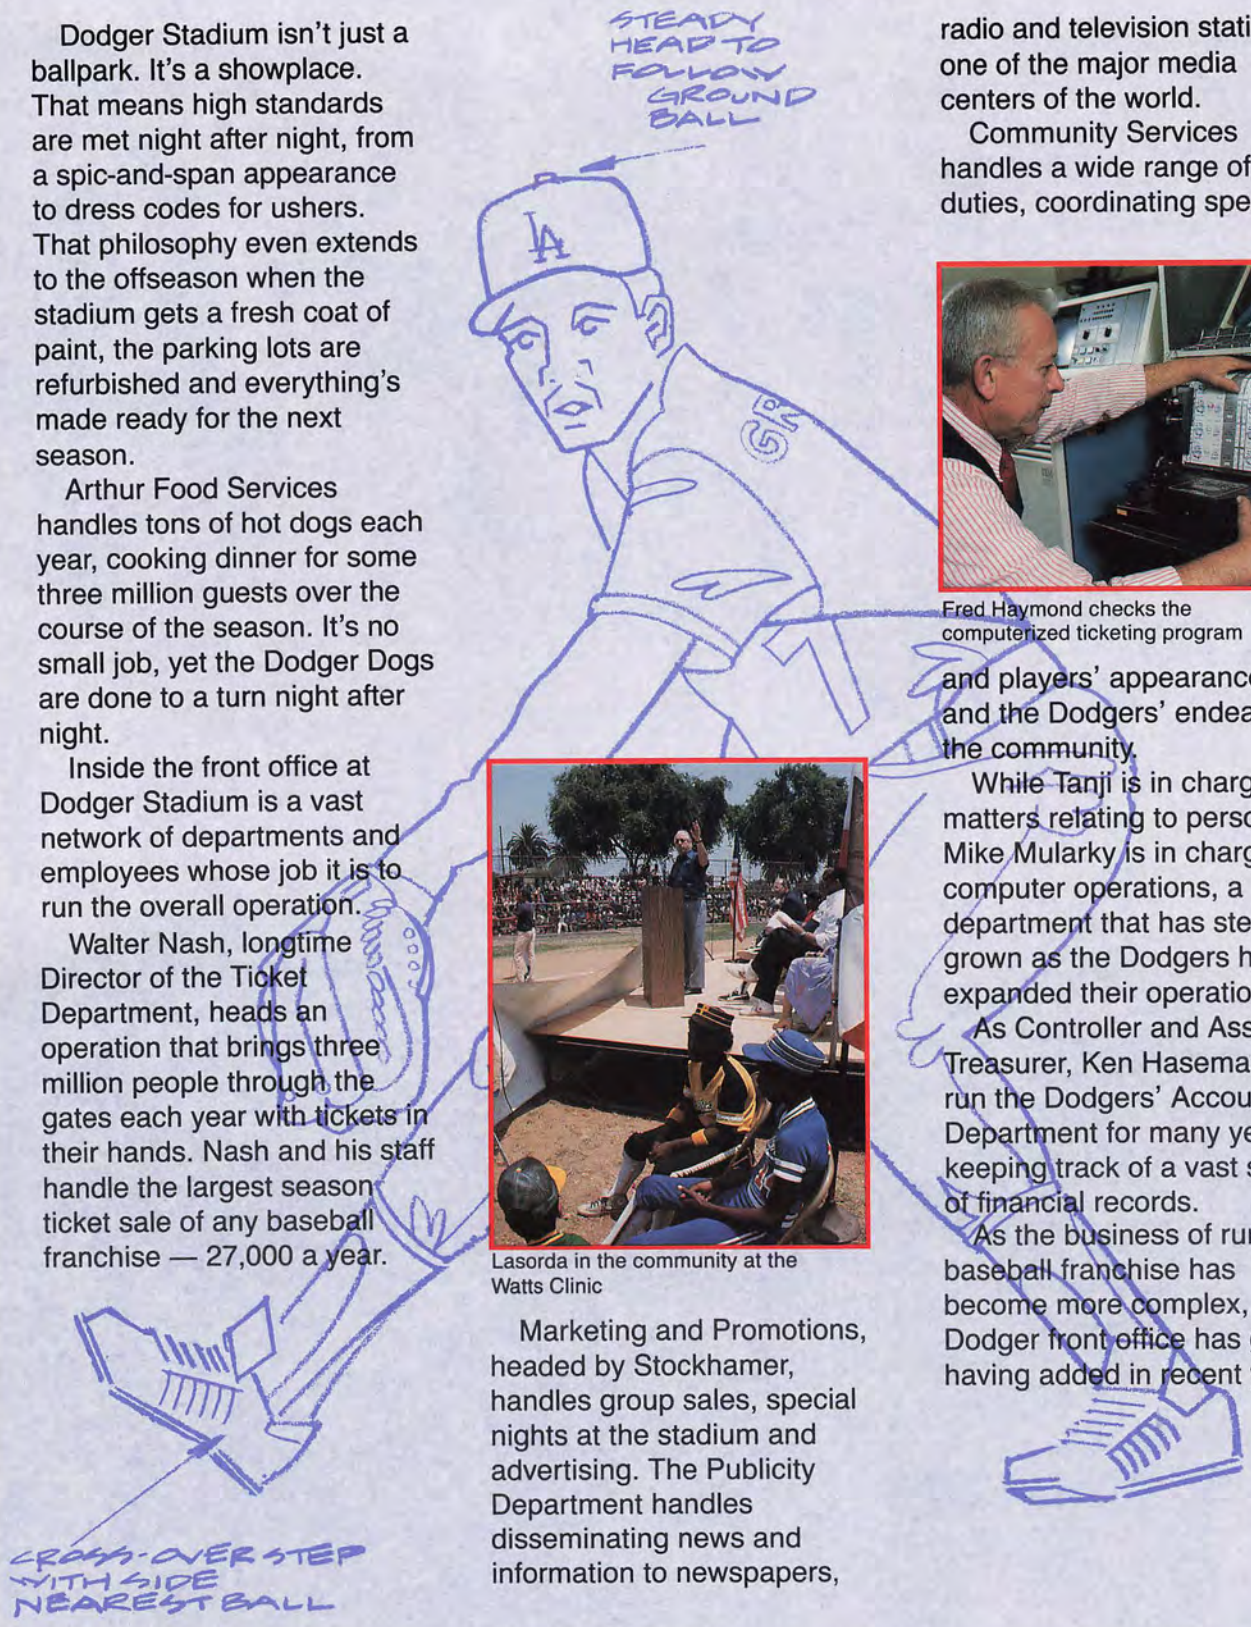
As Director of Stadium Operations, Bob Smith is in charge of all aspects of making sure the stadium is well-cared for and ready for baseball fans when they come through the gates. That means handling the single largest work force in the organization, which includes parking attendants, security personnel, ushers and maintenance personnel.

Dodger Stadium isn't just a ballpark. It's a showplace. That means high standards are met night after night, from a spic-and-span appearance to dress codes for ushers. That philosophy even extends to the offseason when the stadium gets a fresh coat of paint, the parking lots are refurbished and everything's made ready for the next season.

Arthur Food Services handles tons of hot dogs each year, cooking dinner for some three million guests over the course of the season. It's no small job, yet the Dodger Dogs are done to a turn night after night.

Inside the front office at Dodger Stadium is a vast network of departments and employees whose job it is to run the overall operation.

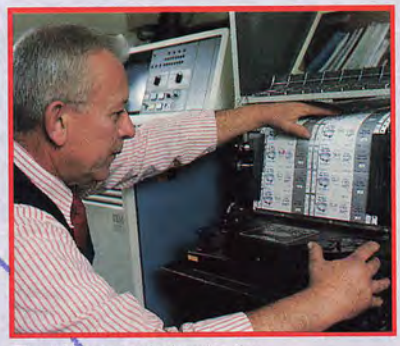
Walter Nash, longtime Director of the Ticket Department, heads an operation that brings three million people through the gates each year with tickets in their hands. Nash and his staff handle the largest season ticket sale of any baseball franchise — 27,000 a year.



Lasorda in the community at the Watts Clinic

Marketing and Promotions, headed by Stockhamer, handles group sales, special nights at the stadium and advertising. The Publicity Department handles disseminating news and information to newspapers, radio and television stations in one of the major media centers of the world.

Community Services handles a wide range of duties, coordinating speakers and players' appearances, and the Dodgers' endeavors in the community.



Fred Haymond checks the computerized ticketing program

While Tanji is in charge of all matters relating to personnel, Mike Mularky is in charge of computer operations, a department that has steadily grown as the Dodgers have expanded their operations.

As Controller and Assistant Treasurer, Ken Hasemann has run the Dodgers' Accounting Department for many years, keeping track of a vast system of financial records.

As the business of running a baseball franchise has become more complex, the Dodger front office has grown, having added in recent years a general counsel, a Director of Financial Projects and a Vice President of Communications.

It was the Dodgers who first brought the Diamond Vision concept to baseball as part of the 1980 All-Star Game. Now many clubs have followed their lead in using big-screen television to make the game more enjoyable for their fans.

Fernando and Lasorda with Sandy Koufax, Jerry Reuss and Johnny Podres

Keeping all of the various departments and employees working in harmony is an enormous task.

The watchword is "continuity."

"We have been very fortunate to have continuity in our organization," Claire said. "We have gone through a period of transition in the last year or so, but, even in transition, we have people who have been part of the organization for a long time and have filled a variety of roles. Walter Nash is one of the most respected men in the ticket sales field. Bob Smith has served us for many years in stadium operations. That kind of experience is vital.

"Another thing that is very important to this organization is that we greatly stress working together. The front office is a team. That becomes more difficult as we grow, but it becomes even more important. When I started 19 years ago, the marketing and promotions and publicity was basically handled by three people: (former Dodger Vice President) Red Patterson, myself and one secretary. Now we've expanded tremendously. At the same time that the operation expands, it's critical that it stays together as one unit. It all must come together.

"Our radio and television package, our involvement with the public in terms of community service . . . there has to be consistency. If a former player is speaking somewhere, he's speaking on behalf of Peter O'Malley and the organization. If he's not totally tuned in to the organization, he can't do that job properly. It's a very demanding business; a very challenging business. We need people with skills in a lot of different areas."

In addition, things must not simply be done. They must be done the Dodger way, according to a very strict code and high standards. The Dodgers pride themselves on running a first-class organization.

Hall of Fame Pitcher Don Drysdale

"We are a very visible business," said Claire. "If things are overlooked, if they are not properly handled, it reflects on the organization. If there is a word or a statistic, or part of a presentation out of place, it can have a tremendous effect. There are far-reaching ramifications to all that we do. That's why our work is so time-consuming; so exacting.

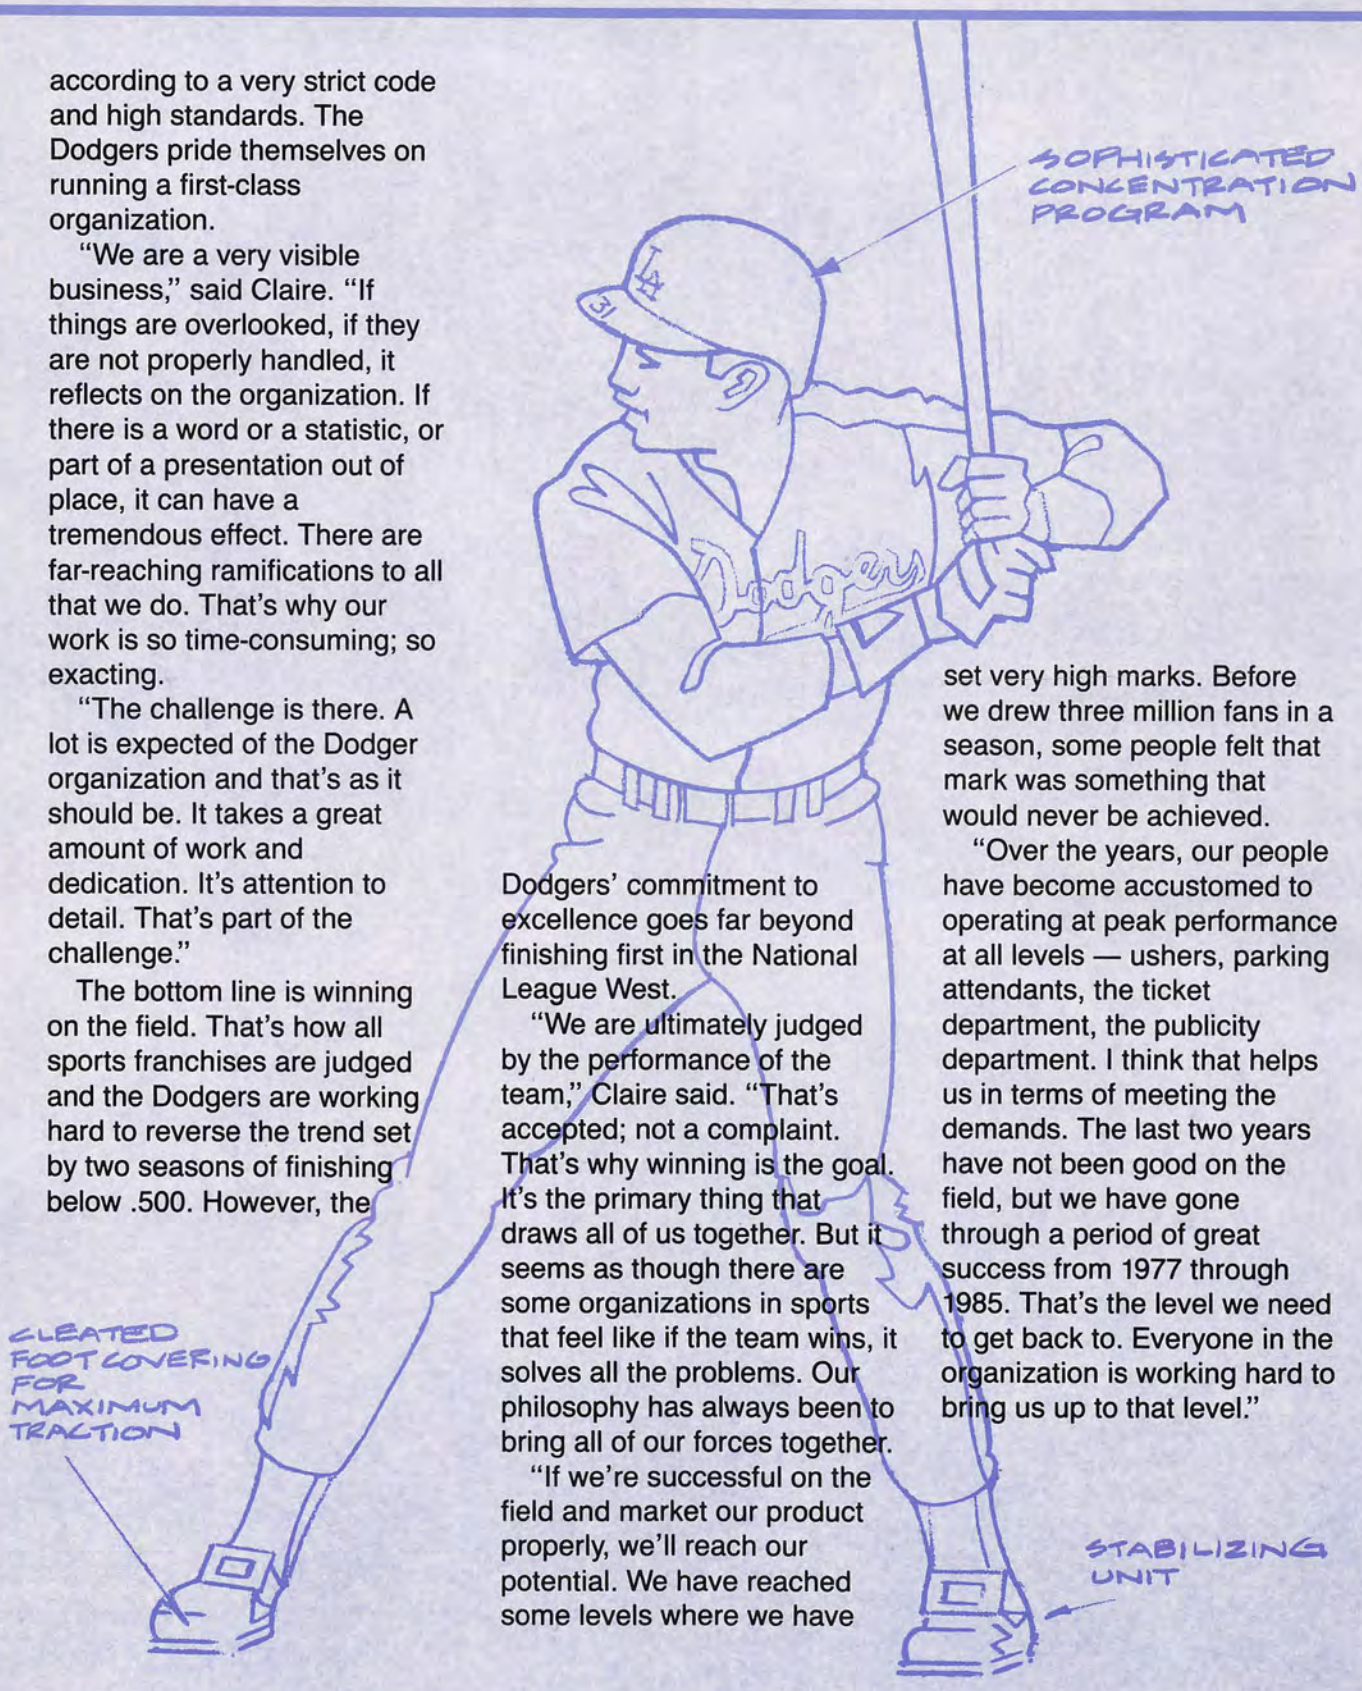
"The challenge is there. A lot is expected of the Dodger organization and that's as it should be. It takes a great amount of work and dedication. It's attention to detail. That's part of the challenge."

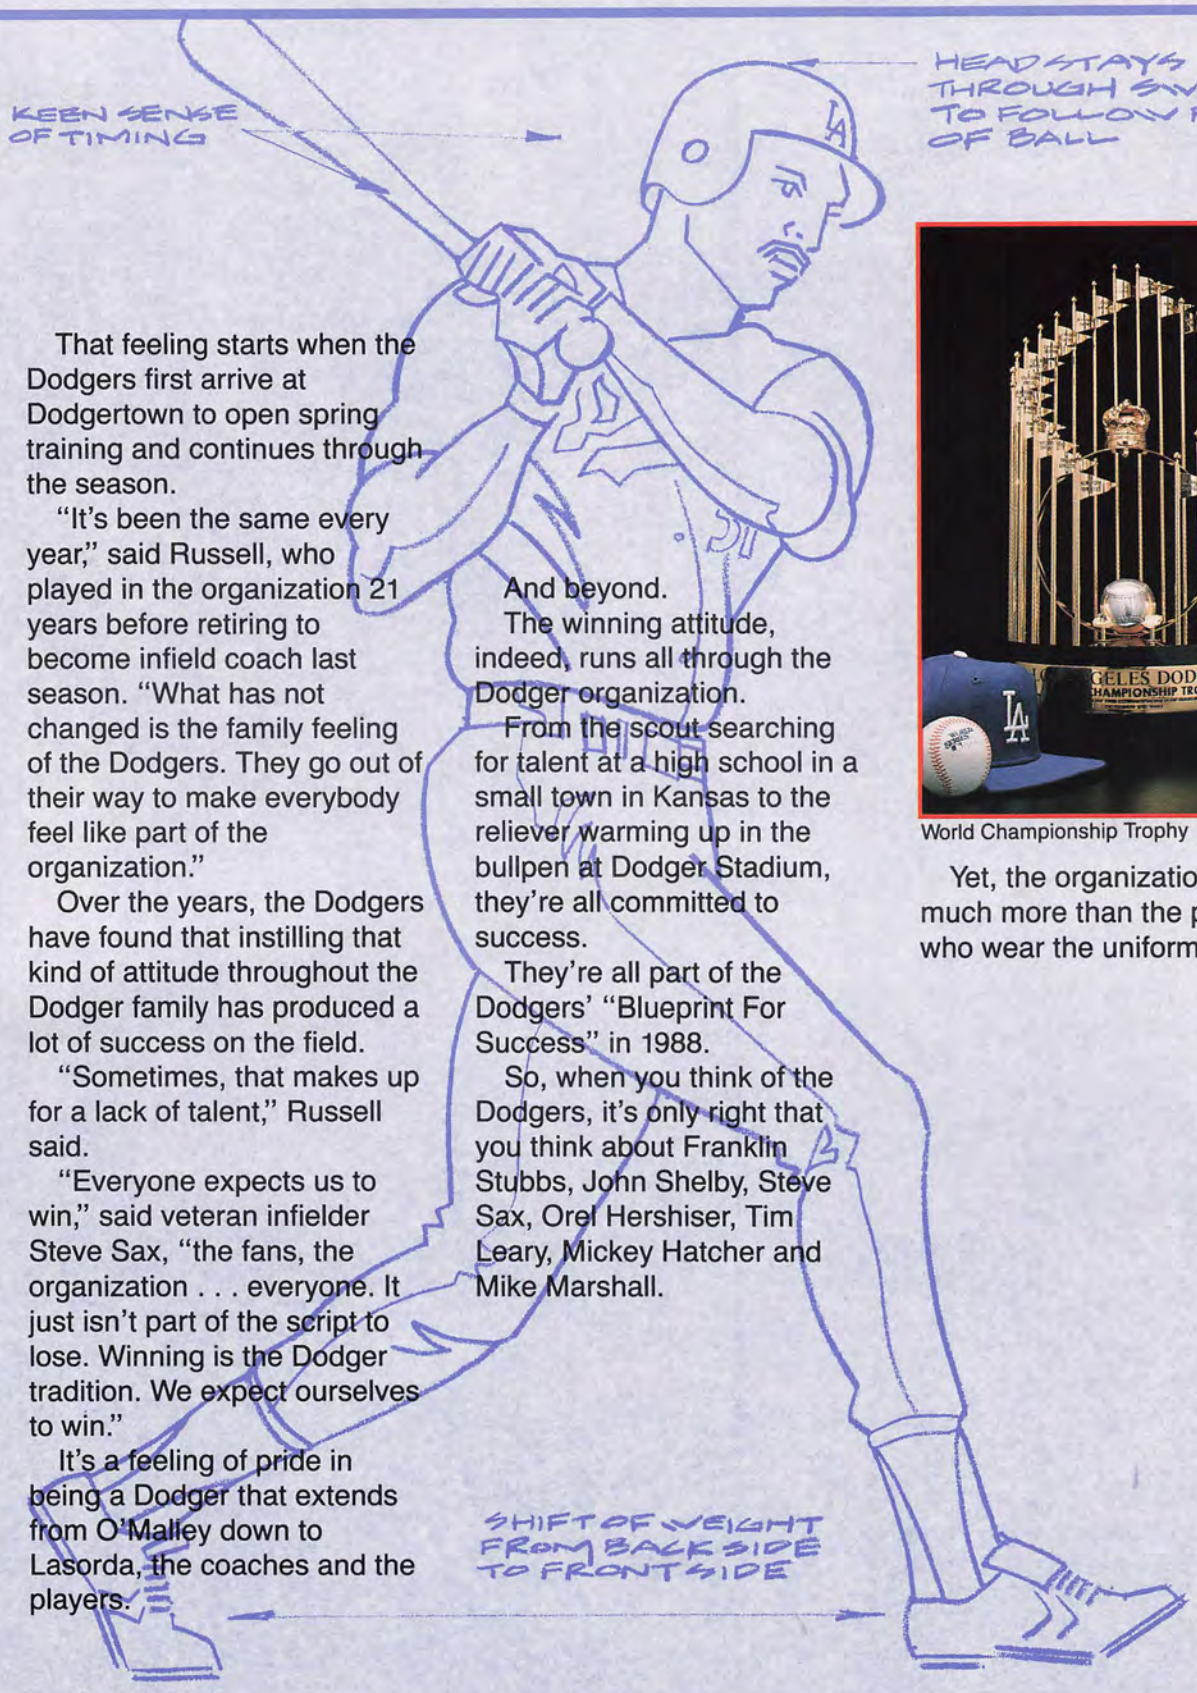
The bottom line is winning on the field. That's how all sports franchises are judged and the Dodgers are working hard to reverse the trend set by two seasons of finishing below .500. However, the Dodgers' commitment to excellence goes far beyond finishing first in the National League West.

"We are ultimately judged by the performance of the team," Claire said. "That's accepted; not a complaint. That's why winning is the goal. It's the primary thing that draws all of us together. But it seems as though there are some organizations in sports that feel like if the team wins, it solves all the problems. Our philosophy has always been to bring all of our forces together.

"If we're successful on the field and market our product properly, we'll reach our potential. We have reached some levels where we have set very high marks. Before we drew three million fans in a season, some people felt that mark was something that would never be achieved.

"Over the years, our people have become accustomed to operating at peak performance at all levels — ushers, parking attendants, the ticket department, the publicity department. I think that helps us in terms of meeting the demands. The last two years have not been good on the field, but we have gone through a period of great success from 1977 through 1985. That's the level we need to get back to. Everyone in the organization is working hard to bring us up to that level."





That feeling starts when the Dodgers first arrive at Dodgertown to open spring training and continues through the season.

"It's been the same every year," said Russell, who played in the organization 21 years before retiring to become infield coach last season. "What has not changed is the family feeling of the Dodgers. They go out of their way to make everybody feel like part of the organization."

Over the years, the Dodgers have found that instilling that kind of attitude throughout the Dodger family has produced a lot of success on the field.

"Sometimes, that makes up for a lack of talent," Russell said.

"Everyone expects us to win," said veteran infielder Steve Sax, "the fans, the organization . . . everyone. It just isn't part of the script to lose. Winning is the Dodger tradition. We expect ourselves to win."

It's a feeling of pride in being a Dodger that extends from O'Malley down to Lasorda, the coaches and the players.

And beyond.

The winning attitude, indeed, runs all through the Dodger organization.

From the scout searching for talent at a high school in a small town in Kansas to the reliever warming up in the bullpen at Dodger Stadium, they're all committed to success.

They're all part of the Dodgers' "Blueprint For Success" in 1988.

So, when you think of the Dodgers, it's only right that you think about Franklin Stubbs, John Shelby, Steve Sax, Orel Hershiser, Tim Leary, Mickey Hatcher and Mike Marshall.

Yet, the organization is so much more than the players who wear the uniforms.

Panasonic introduces a cordless telephone small enough to fit into your shirt pocket. And that's not even the big news.

The big news is that Panasonic put so much into such a small telephone.

The KX-T3000 cordless comes with 10-station automatic dialing. Built-in intercom. And auto redialing.

There are even two security systems. One to help prevent another cordless phone owner from getting your dial tone on his phone. So, the inconvenience of getting bills for calls you never made is virtually eliminated. The second helps prevent other cordless phone owners from eavesdropping on your conversation.

All this and more in a handset that folds in half so it's small enough to fit into your shirt pocket, but big enough to have everything you need. The Panasonic folding cordless. It's an open and shut case.

Welcome to another exciting year of Dodger baseball with our "Blueprint for Success" established with pitching, power and defense. We are blessed with an outstanding and dedicated coaching staff which worked very hard in the spring to prepare our team for the season.

I have every reason to be optimistic about the 1988 season. I think we have done a good job in improving our ballclub and, if we stay healthy, there is no question in my mind that we will be restoring the tradition of winning to our organization and bring to the fans of Los Angeles a team they will be proud to cheer throughout the season.

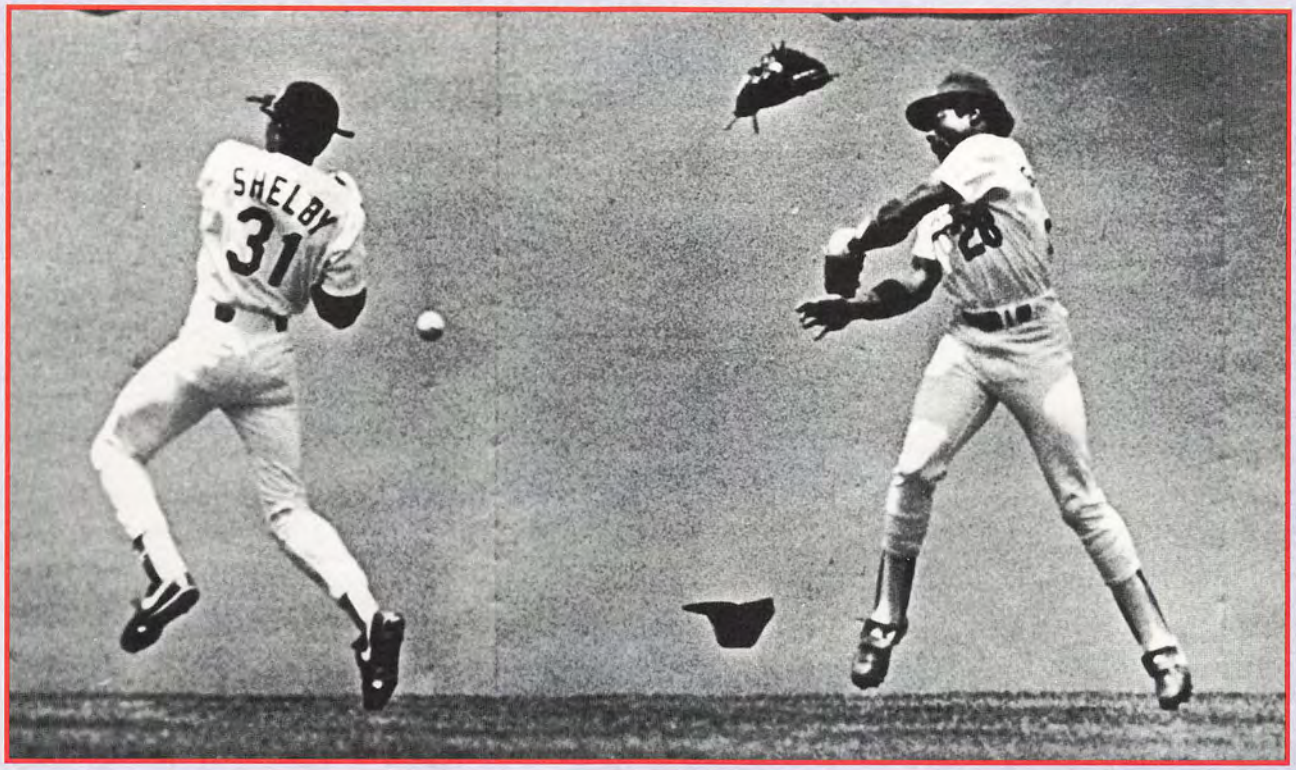
THE L. ANDREW CASTLE AWARD



THE L. ANDREW CASTLE AWARD

Daily News photographer Tom Jagoe is the winner of the 10th annual L. Andrew Castle Award for photographic excellence, presented by the Press Photographers Association of Greater Los Angeles. The award is presented to the professional photographer who takes the best picture at Dodger Stadium.

Jagoe's shot of a collision between centerfielder John Shelby and outfielder Pedro Guerrero was the winning entry in the competition between Southern California's professional photographers.

Castle was a long-time Dodger photographer before he died in 1977. He was also a leader in the Avenue of the Athletes project in the Echo Park district designed to honor former great athletes.

The Dodgers present each year's winner with a $250 cash award, and an additional $250 is contributed to the Avenue of the Athletes project in honor of Castle.
